Fundamentals of Adult Education

Adult education programs serve 1.5 million of the 93 million who could benefit from services.¹ There are waiting lists in most states.²

Often, undereducated adults are challenged with learning disabilities, some diagnosed and some undiagnosed.³ Thus, they may have average or above intelligence, but just process information differently. That might explain why they were not successful in school as children.

Forty-three percent (43%) of current adult education students are English language learners. Twelve percent (12%) are adult secondary students seeking their high school diploma or equivalent. Another Forty-five percent (45%) are native speakers below the ninth grade level.⁴ They come to adult education to leave public assistance, to qualify for employment, to help their children with homework, to become more involved in their communities, and to achieve citizenship skills.⁵

Classes are held in public schools, community colleges, community based organizations, faith-based organizations, universities, libraries and others.⁶ That diversity links adult education with a number of other support services in the community and at work.

Eighty percent (80%) of the 46,500 adult education teachers are part-time⁷ -- mainly because most of our students can commit only part of their day to learning. Part-time teachers bring a richness from their other professions but they also require significant professional development to provide them with the skills they need to respond to the learning needs and levels of adult learners.

Seventy percent ($1.24Billion) of the annual funding is from State and Local sources while only thirty percent ($543M) is from Federal WIOA funds.

Adult education programs are successful in meeting their performance measures as identified in the federal law and negotiated each year with the Department of Education. Those measures include: educational gains in reading, math, and/or English; completion of secondary education; transition to postsecondary education; employment; and retaining employment.⁸ The Office of Management and Budget (OMB) has rated adult education as an "Effective" program-- one of only six Department of Education programs to receive this highest rating.⁹

The following pages provide a snapshot with charts and graphs that depict demographics and impact for the nation and for your state. The Participant data was taken directly from the NRS. Specifically, enrollment data was taken from NRS 2015-2016 Table 1; data on participant status at the time of program entry was taken from NRS Table 6; program percentages from NRS Table 3; program performance data from NRS Table 4; GED/HS completion data from NRS Table 5; non federal funding and the federal grant from OVAE from NRS 2015-2016 Financial Status Report 2 (FSR 2). The table at the bottom of each page shows educational levels and self-reported English language proficiency of all adults in the state, ages 25 and over; this information was taken from the U.S. Census, American Community Survey 2015 five-year projections.

The bar chart detailing younger participants, under the age of 25, shows the distribution of those learners among the three program elements: adult basic education (ABE), adult secondary education (ASE), and English as a Second Language (ESL).

Please feel free to contact your adult education state director listed at the bottom of your state’s page to say "Thank You" for a job well done and for more details on adult learning needs, opportunities, and successes in your state.
